After completing college coursework or a degree, many tour managers get their start by working on live music tours in some non-management capacity. Prospective tour managers might get job experience by working as sound engineers, stage managers or lighting technicians. They might also work as stage hands or tour bus drivers. Alternatively, prospective tour managers might also gain music industry experience by being a local band manager or even a local band musician.

It's important to become familiar with the instruments and sound equipment used by musicians during live tours. Because a tour manager is responsible for assuring that the tour runs smoothly, he or she may find it helpful to develop technical expertise in maintaining and repairing the instruments, sound systems and other mechanical devices used by musicians on the road. The ability to handle mechanical problems in a pinch may mean the difference between the success or failure of a particular performance.
